

Classroom Discussions Following a Crisis

Faculty might consider providing time during class to discuss the incident and the students' feelings about it. The students should be encouraged to express feelings in a supportive atmosphere as soon as possible. The professor might say: "I'm (sad, shaken, upset) by the tragedy that happened in Las Vegas last night" (Sunday, Oct. 1st). I'm glad to be here with you and that we can be together at this time. How are each of you (feeling, doing, coping) with this?" Give the students 30 seconds to a minute to say something. They may need a little time to get the courage to speak. If students do not speak, remind them of your office hours, your e-mail address, and/or your willingness to meet one-on-one. Emphasize that talking about the trauma is a good and healing thing to do. If you share some of your feelings, it will encourage them to talk. A small loss of instructional time may be insignificant if students' learning is being impacted by strong emotional concerns. It is also important to let them know that when events like this occur; our Counseling Center makes special arrangements to provide support to students who are affected by the situation. If they would like help or support, they can contact the Counseling Center directly (312.996.3490), SSB 2010.

Remember that everyone's story is valid. Not every student has to speak. The discussion is best focused on expression of thoughts, feelings, and reactions and not on establishment of facts. Whatever students say can be answered with: "It must be terrible to think about that." Or "It must hurt a lot to remember it that way." Or "This has certainly been difficult".

When the students finish talking, you can offer them a moment of silence. Suggest that they close their eyes and breathe slowly and deeply three or four times. If you are worried about a particular student, approach her/him privately. If you are able to identify students who are most upset, a referral to the Counseling Center would be helpful. If you are concerned about your own reactions to the situation, consider seeking help. Give us a call and we can chat with you about whether you should think about seeking help and offer you a referral.

Some students who have had close involvement with the recent or a past catastrophic tragedy may have very vivid perceptions or recollections regarding the sights, sounds, smells, and tastes of the event. It's not uncommon for them to feel something is wrong with them because the memories of these sensory perceptions are so strong. You can reassure them that such feelings are not uncommon after a tragedy. You might ask: "Others have reported similar perceptions and thoughts after such a tragedy." Or, "It must have been so upsetting to (see,hear, feel, smell, taste) that." Some students feel very guilty. They may have been close enough to the situation or victims that they believe there is something they should have done to prevent the tragedy or harm to some of the victims. They may believe that they should have been there to help some of the victims. To address this, you might say: "After a tragedy, people often second guess themselves, and they are not sure they did everything they could. That's a natural feeling of wanting to help others. It does not reflect what was really possible."

A future orientation is helpful. You might ask: "What are you worried about right now?" When they speak about future concerns, you might be able to alleviate some of their worries with facts or other ideas and thoughts. Giving students a chance to share their worries reduces anxiety. You can say, "It's really too early to know all the facts about what is going to happen. But you help yourself to deal with this tragedy. Many people find that talking with others, spending time with family, connecting with ministers, rabbis, or priests can hasten the healing process.

After class, if students come to your office to speak in private, remember they are looking for someone who will validate their grief, not talk them out of it. Sitting quietly with them and letting them talk may be all that is needed. Share your own feelings about the tragedy. You might even tell them about other losses you've experienced if you're comfortable with that. If you do talk about past losses, it is helpful to end by saying that for you there was a gradual improvement in hopefulness and mood as time passed. You can simply say that you hope they have the same experience of healing.

(This guide to emotional debriefing in class has been previously adapted from a similar guide written for the faculty at Texas A&M University following a fatal bonfire tragedy)